Creative Portfolio

hey, I'm Evan

I'm a multidisciplinary creative leader who likes staying close to the work. Over the last 12+ years, I've worked across brand, design, photography, video, motion, digital, editorial, and physical experiences.

I'm most interested in work that starts with a real problem, brings the right people together, and turns an idea into something clear and engaging. I've led teams and large programs, but I still enjoy designing, shooting, building, and figuring things out myself.

XO Detroit

XO Detroit was an opportunity to create work centered on the people, places, and experiences that make Detroit feel like Detroit.

I worked across the project from creative direction and design through photography, video, and production, building a visual approach that felt energetic, authentic, and rooted in the city itself. The work moved across digital experiences, events, and original content, so the system had to feel consistent without becoming overly rigid.

TBD Magazine

TBD was an editorial project focused on Detroit's creative community, local businesses, culture, and the people shaping the city.

As Art Director and Photographer, I helped establish the visual identity and editorial approach across print, web, photography, and design. I photographed stories myself, selected and directed other local photographers, and worked to give each feature its own personality while keeping the publication recognizable as a whole.

Monroe St. Drive In

Monroe Street Drive-In started as a response to a very specific problem: how do you create a shared experience when people can't gather the way they normally would?

I helped develop the concept and led the creative across branding, environmental graphics, signage, digital communications, photography, video, and the guest experience. We built the system while the physical site was still coming together, so the work had to be flexible enough to adapt quickly without losing the idea.

The first season sold out nearly every night, and the activation continued for three years.

Residential Leasing

At Bedrock, I worked closely with development, leasing, and architecture teams to translate properties into stories people could understand and imagine themselves in.

Above-and-Beyond Spaces to Share

Fitness Center

Taking workouts to new heights with inspiring city views from the 35th floor, the well-outfitted fitness center features free weights, state-of-the-art bikes and a yoga studio to accommodate residents' personal routines.

Community Lounge

The community lounge complements residents' individual living spaces by providing an additional kitchen, a game area and mini offices, plus comfortable seating to watch the big-screen TVs or take in the scenes of the city from 34 stories up.

Pet-Friendly Perks

Pets are welcome roommates for residents, and the dog wash on the ground floor makes bath time a walk in the park. With the adjacent dog park across the street, The Stott can make the city feel like your pet's backyard.

Cisco Secure

Cisco Secure brought together several established security brands into one connected portfolio. The challenge was creating a more consistent brand and helping customers understand how the individual products fit together without losing the recognition and trust each one had already built.

One of the ways we communicated that shift was through customer storytelling. Rather than focusing on a single product, we showed how real customers used multiple Cisco Secure solutions together, connecting individual product benefits to a broader security story.

WiFi 7 Launch

Cisco's WiFi 7 launch had a lot of technical information competing for attention. My job was to help turn that complexity into a clear visual story for Cisco Spaces and show what the technology actually enabled for customers.

I developed the art direction and helped build the campaign across social, web, launch content, and supporting digital assets. Rather than competing with Cisco's broader WiFi 7 announcement, we created a second layer of storytelling that connected the technology to smarter physical spaces and real use cases.

e3 refillery

e3 Refillery gave me the chance to build a brand from the ground up rather than inherit an existing system.

I developed the identity, visual language, website and e-commerce experience, packaging, photography direction, social content, and launch materials. Because it was a small business, the work had to do more than look good — it had to be practical, flexible, and easy to keep using as the business grew.

It's also been a chance for me to stay hands-on with design, web development, content, and emerging creative tools.

BRAND LOGO

A - Minimum Size

Because the "refillery" text is a script font with thinner strokes, it can "disappear" or become illegible if scaled down too much.

Print: The logo width should never be smaller than 2 inch to ensure the "refillery" script remains legible in physical packaging.

Digital: The logo width should never be smaller than 80 pixels for web and mobile applications.

B - Exclusion Area (Clear Space)

Maintaining breathing room is vital for an eco-conscious brand to feel "airy" and clean. Instead of using a letter like Beatrix's "B", you should use a recurring element from your own logo.

Guideline: Always provide adequate clear space around the logo to maintain its integrity. Use the height of the "3" from the logo to define the minimum exclusion zone on all four sides.
